

TWO MEN ON A BED

sounded erotic : affix homo and you qualify desire not bodies : but suggested a plot a scene and that word history : so let me invert sequence and dispense three facts : Francis

Bacon's 1953 composition echoed an 1887 photo by Eadweard Muybridge : and I write, type this rather : in early 2003 : one hundred thirty four years since homosexuality came to be : forget history :

its language bores me : let's trace memory : first time I was one of two men on a bed : July 1997 :

want details : our bodies blurred where they met in shadow : the spine's arc of light slight swell of dimpled glut inner line of thigh the calf's tight half : who's on top : well that depends at which point you enter how the body bends and how you decide to plot bodies and bed if you feel anchored by a room's rectangle or a sphere's gravity : side to side cheek on cheek elbow hooked under knee the crossed leg pointed foot : should I pull these shapes out of focus mute the palette : would you rather words like mount slime teeth baredlike-an-animal : I draw lines : two diagonals one horizontal two verticals : and create three walls and a ceiling : but must I say perspective recedes scene weighed down by a white double bed as it cuts across a black foreground : if I describe two bodies as ashen pasty ghostly must I also urge words like sinister wail and should I pursue bars or can I exit through streaks that rise fall fold and splay like a thin but shimmering veil

Copyright © 2009 by Matthew Hittinger.
All rights reserved.
Published in Issue 3 of Ouroborus Review.

Eadweard Muybridge's 1887 photograph Two Men Wrestling.

Francis Bacon's 1953 oil Two Figures.